Vikram handles business litigation in New York state, New York federal, and bankruptcy courts. Clients involved in challenging disputes value his diligence, pragmatism, and strategic approach to reaching resolution.

Vikram represents companies in a variety of sectors, including financial services, retail banking, real estate, and telecommunications. He is adept at untangling intricate, fact-intensive matters, drawing on prior experience at a global law firm in San Francisco to efficiently sift through large volumes of information and piece together complex fact patterns. From the outset of each case, Vikram works to forge strong relationships with his clients in order to understand their business environments and craft litigation strategies that meet their goals.

Vikram also maintains an active pro bono practice, with an emphasis on matters regarding low-income housing, family law, the death penalty, and policing. He brings substantial advocacy experience to this work, including positions with the New York City branch of Human Rights Watch and the ACLU.
